My wish for each of my readers is that they stay well all year through and God bless each one.

World's Most Famous Fossil Hunter

At the bottom of a cliff in Olduvai Gorge in Tanzania, where rock and mineral deposits were formed two million years ago, Louis S. B. Leakey and his wife, Mary, uncovered fossil remains of a prehistoric member of the family of man dating back 1.75 million years. They named him Zinjanthropus. Leakey's monumental story is the subject of the eleventh second National Geographic Special, January 9, on Public Television stations.

"The Legacy of L. S. B. Leakey," which visits the area of Africa where Leakey and his wife studied for 30 years, is narrated by E. G. Marshall. The special is made possible by a grant from Gulf Oil Corporation, and is jointly produced by the National Geographic Society and WQED in Pittsburgh.

Leakey was sometimes called the modern counterpart of the Renaissance's "universal man." Not only was he an anthropologist and archeologist, but zoologist, historian, linguist, and even a detective, handwriting analyst, and intelligence expert.

On this special the camera captures Leakey testing the theories he formulated about how early man lived: Chipping tools from rock and devising snares of cord made of tree bark. He died in 1972, but the theories of this man whom a tribal chief once called "the black man with the white face," challenge science still.

Thousands Die Early From Smoking Diseases

Each pack of cigarets sold in the United States carries the warning that smoking may be harmful to your health. What exactly does this mean to smokers?

There no longer is any scientific doubt that tobacco smoking, and particularly cigaret smoking, is associated with shortened life expectancy. Some 300,000 Americans die prematurely each year from diseases related to smoking.

Smoking is a major cause of lung cancer, heart disease, emphysema and chronic bronchitis. Tobacco smoking also is strongly associated with cancers of the larynx, mouth, esophagus and urinary bladder. Smoking is associated with increased risk of strokes and other circulatory diseases.

In most diseases related to smoking the health hazards are directly proportional to the number of cigarets smoked per day, the earlier the age at which smoking was started, and the number of years smoking has continued. Those who start young, smoke heavily and keep it up for many years are the greatest risk.

Fortunately, those who quit smoking begin to decrease the risk to their health as soon as they quit.

Most smoke-related diseases develop over a long period of time, but every single cigaret affects a smoker, says the AMA pamphlet: Smoking: Facts You Should Know. Even one cigaret increases blood pressure and heartbeat and slows down the action of the cilia inside the bronchial tubes. The cilia work like tiny brooms to keep the lungs clean and when they are not working properly the lungs are vulnerable to all kinds of infection.

Smoke, a product of combustion, contains hundreds of chemical substances, including nicotine, tars and carbon monoxide. Nicotine indirectly causes blood vessels to constrict, which in turn forces the heart to pump harder and faster, increasing the stress on the cardiovascular system. Tars in smoke are tiny particles that settle on the membranes of the breathing passages and delicate lung tissues. Tars contain chemicals that have produced cancer in experimental animals. Carbon monoxide reduces the oxygen-carrying ability of the blood by driving oxygen from red blood cells. As much as 10 per cent of the oxygen that would normally be carried by the red cells is driven out by the carbon monoxide.

Seventy-five years ago cigarets were not recognized as an important threat to public health. They were not a major article of consumption. Today they are both.

UNDERSTANDING MENTAL HEALTH

a health column from the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration
U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

Natural Disaster—Unnatural Stress

The Nation joined in the recent agony of Buffalo, New York, parts of western Pennsylvania and many other areas of the country hurt by the severe winter of 1976-77. Yet, until rather recently, the loss and special stresses accompanying such great natural disasters were overlooked insofar as their role in causing mental health problems was concerned.

This is the view of Dr. Calvin Frederick, Chief of the Mental Health Applications Assistance Section of the National Institute of Mental Health.

He points out that although everyone can see the gross physical results of a disaster, psychological damage is more subtle and often requires professional skill to evaluate.

Individual response to disaster doesn't always conform to expectations. For example, few people become so panic stricken in a disaster that they run amok. But neither do disasters invariably unite people.

During the acute phases of disasters, standard psychotherapy techniques are not available, the NIMH scientist says. If a disaster is spread over days or weeks, personal recovery cannot begin immediately, which makes for a greater psychological toll than the fast, "quickly over" type of catastrophe. During the country's winter emergency, the intense cold, exhausted fuel supplies, word of barges hopelessly trapped in rivers of almost solid ice, dwindling food supplies, reports of more and more deaths nationwide from the cold and snow, and the very fact that arctic cold in normally temperate zones seems beyond people's ken, all made adjustment extremely difficult.

Symptoms of stress among adults, Dr. Frederick says, are those of initial anxiety followed by a sense of aneer, resentment, and hostility. Then comes depression and loss of ambition or drive.

The anger is at the untoward events themselves—but it gets "displaced" onto neighbors, family members, children, or helping personnel. This is followed by self-blame and then a sense of depression and hopelessness.

Catastrophes commonly bring forth a community outpouring of love and caring and giving—and in some cases, the "community" is as broad as the whole country. However, it must be recognized that not everyone, even close by, will respond in this way. And victims may harbor resentment against those spared serious loss.

Dr. Frederick advises persons generally to avoid referring to mental health while helping those numbed by loss.

He states: "The notion that anyone needs psychological or psychiatric assistance may be seen as a threat, all by itself. The idea has been perpetuated in many areas that it is a sign of moral weakness to need psychological counseling. It is poor judgement to allow this view to prevent the receipt of needed services."

Large Crowd Attend Christmas Service

An unusally large crowd attended the regular preaching service at the Promise Land Baptist Church on Christmas Day. Visitors and friends from several local churches were present. The pastor delivered a very inspiring message on the theme: "Jesus The Messiah" The church choir rendered beautiful Christmas music. The service was enjoyed by all. During the offering period, a love offering was taken for the pastors Christmas. The presentation was made to the pastor on behalf of the members and friends of the church by deacon Stewart Robinson.

The Galilee Sunday School presented its annual Chrismtas program on last Friday evening. Short drills and exercises were given by members of each class. Miss Crysatal Mays served as mistress of ceremony. Bags and gifts were presented to all the members and friends present. The pastor of the church, Rev. R. Q. Lawing, Jr. and the superintendent of the school gave remarks.

Regular evening service was held at the Mount Shiloh Baptist Church Christmas evening at 7 p.m. The Junior Choir rendered beautiful music. The pastor of the church delivered the evening message. The service was enjoyed by all who were present.

A very large crowd attended the sunrise preaching service at the Zion Baptist Church last preaching service. The pastor Rev. L. E. Hankins delivered a very challenging message on the theme: "Peace and Good Will." All present enjoyed the message. The offering for the day was very good. The Junior Choir rendered beautiful music with Miss Derby Hankins at the piano.

The Zion Baptist Sunday School presented its annual Christmas program on Christmas morning at 11 a.m. The program followed the regular Sunday School Service. The pastor of the church gave some very helpful remarks. Gifts were exchanged by members of the school. A special love gift was presented to the pastor by the pastors aid club.

Mrs. Mary C. Brown has returned to her home in Richmond, Virginia after receiving special treatment in a Richmond hospital.

A special youth program was presented recently at the Zion Baptist Church under the direction of Mrs. Rebecca Ferguson. The Youth Choir rendered special music. The program was enjoyed by all.

The senior usher board of the Zion Baptist Church held its regular monthly meeting recently with its president, Mrs. Mattie Lawson presiding. Plans were made for making the presentations to the pastor at the annual Christmas Day service.

A large number of local young people are spending the holiday here with their parents.

All officers, members and friends are cordially invited to attend the regular preaching service at the Galilee Baptist Church this Sunday morning at 11 a.m.

The annual church meeting will be held at the Galilee Baptist Church this Saturday evening at 7 p.m. All officers and auxiliary presidents are asked to be present and prepared to make their financial report to the church.

The local branch of the NAACP will hold its regular meeting at the Zion Baptist Church on Monday after the second Sunday in January at 7:30 p.m. Members and friends are asked to attend. The date will be January 9.

The Appomattox Assembly will hold its monthly meeting at the Galilee Baptist Church on Wednesday, January 11 at 7:30 p.m. Mr. Anderson, director of the State Assemblies will be the guest speaker. Members and friends are requested to attend.

REPORT TO CONSUMERS

Many concerned legislators are working to save you money.

These lawmakers are opposing "Bottle Bills" that are aimed at having beverage containers be returnable and refillable—that is, deposit bottles.

Economic experts testify enactment of forced deposit legislation would mean higher consumer prices. They say it would mean that all production, handling, warehousing, transportation, delivery and marketing of soft drinks and beer, now keyed to cans and non-refillable bottles would be made obsolete and replaced with refillable bottle procedures. This could ultimately cost the consumer billions of dollars.

In addition, the all-refillable system is time-consuming for the retailer, who must also pass the added burden to the consumer. It takes a refillable bottle about four to six weeks to make a "cycle" from factory to return for refilling. The bottle must be inventoried, sorted, trucked to and from the retailer, washed and stored at the bottling plant. The refillable bottle system produces less per man hour on the production line, uses more warehouse space, transportation and service-sales manpower, more vehicles and more fuel to deliver the same amount of product. All this costs manufacturers, bottlers and retailers more money, and if they're to stay in business, they must pass the cost on to the consumer through higher beverage prices or higher prices spread over other products.

What Treatment For Alcoholism?

What treatment is recommended for alcoholic persons?

This question is often asked of the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism. Since each case of alcoholism is different, treatment varies. But in all cases, chances for recovery are better if treatment is started early.

Treatment generally covers three elements:

- Controlling the physical reactions produced when a person stops drinking—extreme nervousness, anxiety, sweating, nausea, trembling or the "shakes." and, in advanced stages, delirium tremens
- Correcting health problems which might have been caused by alcoholism, such as malnutrition and other ailments
- Helping the person to change behavior patterns so that destructive drinking stops

To obtain long-lasting results, some form of counseling, psychotherapy, or group therapy is generally recommended.

Treatment is considered successful when the person stops drinking or decreases the amount of alcohol he or she takes and begins to find more rewarding ways of living. In most cases the person is able to reestablish a normal family life.

He or she can once again begin to function adequately on the job and gradually regain the respect of friends and acceptance in the community. Even if the individual suffers a relapse, this does not mean that treatment has been a failure.

In many cases hospitalization is not necessary. The alcoholic person can often receive treatment in an outpatient clinic, a doctor's office, or a treatment center. While receiving treatment. the person can go about his or her usual activities at home and on the job.

In very severe cases of alcoholism, the patient should remain for some time in a hospital or similar institution where the mind, as well as the body, can gradually rid itself of the effects of alcohol without endangering the person's life.

If you would like to learn more about alcoholism and how it can be treated, write to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA), Box 2345, Rockville, Maryland 20852.
